

Day-by-day Program

The Tällberg Forum can be seen as a smörgåsbord of activities from which you can compose a program of your choice. The Forum builds on several central program elements.

The Plenary sessions (one or two per day) provide participants with analyses on the main theme of the Forum. They all take place in the main tent in the Forum Center at Holen. They consist mainly of panel conversations, with a minimum of prepared statements. They are open to participating spouses and also to the general public and the media.

The Workshops and Conversations (in total five slots of parallel events over three days) aim to explore specific themes in more depth. There are 10 workshops and approximately 40 conversations in the program, designed for smaller groups (about 75–100 per workshop and 20–40 per conversation). Workshops and conversations take place at selected hotels and are open to the forum participants and, space permitting, to spouses and families.

The Reflection groups provide participants with the opportunity, in a more intimate atmosphere, to bring together in conversations a variety of ideas and perspectives, to help structure the thinking, to integrate the learning experience and to allow synthesis to emerge. All participants will be assigned to a reflection group that will consist of 10 members. Each group will have an experienced facilitator.

In addition to these, there is a rich program of cultural performances, and open space of free time (for informal meetings, excursions, walks or just taking it easy).

“ The World is better organized for us to live apart, not together. But living apart is no longer an option. ”

Bo Ekman

The quotes are “Visions From the Present” by the participants.

“ A ‘system’ or ‘vision’ comes down not to the people who create the idea, but the people who live out the vision in a very real, day to day vision. ”

George Asatiani

How can we deal with fundamentalist beliefs and those who embrace them while at the same time affirming and spreading humanistic values? To live together we need to understand each other more than ever before. The threats coming from weapons of mass destruction or from the abuse of the environment are compounded by fundamentalist beliefs that justify destructiveness. Fundamentalism (religious or ideological) claims absolute truths. In contrast, humanism is founded on profound values such as reverence for life, human dignity and pluralism. It embraces science in the service of life, while recognizing that universal values of human dignity and development may be expressed differently in different cultures.

10.30 Globalization and the future of value creation

- Location: The Forum Tent at Holen
Session open for the media and public

Globalization is the process through which frictions and barriers are gradually removed in our systems of value creation (production, logistics, distribution, finance, communication, etc.). It is the process through which we make systems work more effectively, and the driver of this process is our never-ending quest for productivity, higher yields on capital and economic growth. Globalization is not a political project, it is not fundamentally driven by nation-states or political parties. Rather, it is driven by the market. Many of the opportunities and threats of globalization will be discussed throughout the Tällberg Forum. The objective of this panel is to look at the visions and scenarios of the next phases of the processes of globalization.

19.30 Nation Building: the stepping stone for governance of the global issues

- Location: The Forum Tent at Holen
Session open for the media and public

The fact that many member governments of the international community (and therefore of the UN, WTO or the World Bank) are not democratically elected severely undermines the effectiveness of global governance. One way to rebuild the legitimacy of international organizations goes through strengthening the representation and accountability of national governments towards their own constituencies. Nation-building has become a catchphrase for very different approaches to the process of supporting the development of democracy and market economy. This panel will discuss nation-building: How can domestic aspirations and international influence be reconciled? What forms should international pressure and support take? Should they connect with governments or directly with citizens? At what stages are such measures most effective?

Session moderator: Erik Berglöf (SITE, Stockholm School of Economics, Sweden)

We are now midway through the Forum. This evening’s open-floor session gives interested participants the opportunity to discuss which have become the main trends in the Tällberg Forum conversations. Which, if any, should be the priorities of the two final days of work when we are shifting the focus of our discussions from the “what” to the “how”?

10.30 The Transformation into the post-modern world of interdependent nations

- Location: The Forum Tent at Holen
Session open for the media and public

Globalization is changing in the role of the nation state. The increasing interdependence fostered by economic integration is reducing sovereignty. In order to reconcile issues such as security, climate change, HIV/AIDS, and migration, policy making and concerted action is badly needed. The relationship between the changed role of the Nation State and the need for reformed institutions for multilateral decision-making will be the focus of this panel conversation.

19.45 Getting our act together: reconciling the human ambitions of the rich and the poor with environmental realities

- Location: The Forum Tent at Holen
Session open for the media and public

The world has witnessed phenomenal growth in prosperity since 1945. However, poverty is still a major problem; more than 3 billion people have to survive on $2 a day or less. A major challenge will be to try to bring several billion people into the market economy in the next decades. Another even greater challenge is to reconcile the estimated doubling or tripling of the world economy between now and 2050 with the increasing strains put on the environment. Changes in the biosphere and the climate are widespread. The main problem is not running out of finite materials but the damage we inflict on living systems on which we ultimately depend. How can we decouple economic growth from energy and material throughput and develop a production/consumption system in greater harmony with the natural systems? This panel will discuss what policy frameworks and business models are required to respond to the basic needs of all and, at the same time, reconcile human aspirations with environmental realities.

10.30 The challenges to the emerging leadership – and lessons to be learned from principled pragmatists such as Schweitzer, Gandhi, Hammarskjöld and Mandela...

- Location: The Forum Tent at Holen
Session open for the media and public

In addressing the Tällberg question, “How on earth can we live together,” our conversation so far has covered many steps: our world today, the needs we share to raise our future, the importance of humanistic values, changing patterns of value creation, nation-building and governance, the challenges of economic and ecological sustainability. What emerges is a complicated and systemic set of challenges that we all face. Throughout history good and great leaders have emerged, leaders from different levels and sectors (village and tribal councils, presidents, CEO’s, spiritual, civil and NGO leaders) whose principled pragmatism helped steer humankind towards a more secure and enlightened harbour. This panel conversation on the emerging leadership draws upon the lessons of past leaders who were guided by wisdom and by values that inspired them to act on the challenges of their time. What can these leadership legacies tell us today? How can we preserve and utilize this cultural heritage of leadership to shape the future?
